3. In the country you can buy homes for less.
4. Those who like being around animals should live in the city.

Is it better to live in the city or country?

The city is an exciting place, and although visiting the countryside can be ideal for vacations, having people nearby to help can bring more peace of mind in terms of safety. The city always has something going on, such as events, new restaurants, theaters and discos.

Some remote locations are unsafe, but the same can be said of the inner-cities, whose crime rates are exponentially worse in places like Chicago, Miami, or Los Angeles. However, in the city there are wide selections of stores and jobs. In terms of safety, local fire and police stations ensure quicker emergency response times.

Living in the country can certainly be ideal for the more introverted and for those who are not afraid of manual labor or becoming a Do-It-Yourself-er. You can own more land and buy homes for less.

It all depends, then, on what your preference is and on where you'd be happier. If you like being around lots of people, don't like being out in the Sun much, and aren't keen on driving through miles of cornfields just to get to the nearest shopping center, then city living would probably be ideal. But if you have anxiety attacks, consider yourself an outdoors person, or enjoy being around animals, your life may be complete in the heart of the country.
