Why Are So Many Languages Disappearing?

Today, there are around 7,000 languages spoken around the world. However, experts believe that many of them could disappear before the end of this century. (1) _____. One reason is that young people often stop learning the language of their parents or grandparents. Instead, they speak a more common language at school, at work, and online.

(2) _____. As a result, fewer children grow up speaking the traditional language, and after some time it is no longer used in everyday life. When a language disappears, we lose more than just words. Languages contain stories, songs, traditions and knowledge about nature that may exist nowhere else. (3) _____. For example, some languages have many different words to describe local plants and animals. This information has been collected over hundreds of years.

Fortunately, many people are trying to save endangered languages. (4) _____. Some schools now teach local languages, while community groups organise classes for both children and adults.

Technology is also helping. (5) _____. People can record conversations, create online dictionaries and share videos in their own language. This makes it easier for younger generations to learn.

However, saving a language is not always easy. (6) _____. If only a few elderly people still speak it, there may not be enough teachers to pass it on to children. Even so, many experts believe there is still hope.

(7) _____. Every language that survives helps to keep a unique culture and history alive for future generations.

- A. They also include important information about the environment.
- B. In many places, families begin using the national language at home.
- C. Every two weeks, one language is thought to die out.
- D. Many projects now use books, apps and websites to support learning.
- E. The process can be difficult when there are very few speakers left.
- F. If communities work together; they can keep their language alive.
- G. Most people prefer learning two or three foreign languages.
- H. In some countries, speaking a minority language was once discouraged.
